Teche.—Medium size with thin shell and very prolific bearer. It is usually a heavy bearer and popular among those who have them. Nuts similar to Frotcher, but some smaller.

DIRECTIONS FOR PLANTING

The hole should be dug about 2 1-2 feet wide and three feet deep. The tree should be set in the ground fully as deep as it grew in the nursery and the ground level and should be slightly below the surrounding surface so that water will accumulate around the tree, but this depression should never be allowed to settle enough to expose any part of the roots or tree that was originally under ground. Place the top soil in the hole first, and top soil is also better than clay on the top. Press the dirt firmly about the roots as it is put in the hole, being careful not to bruise the roots in tramping. Do not let the trees lie out in the sun or air, but unpack them only when you are ready to plant them. Wet the packed roots, or keep wet sack over them until planted.
